Educating Students To Become Servants of Christ
To Make a Difference in Today’s World.
One of our featured articles in this edition focuses on the role of Christians in society. As we hear and read much about “fiscal cliffs” and “entitlements,” we find our sure foundation in faithfully pursuing the only One who brings sustained prosperity and life. Because God’s Word speaks with relevance and authority to all issues in the culture, Bryan’s mission is ever more essential in preparing this and future generations to shape culture with a Kingdom perspective.

This preparation requires multiple layers of teaching from our faculty and layers of experience for our students. Our students are equipped with an understanding of how a culture can be transformed by the Bible’s timeless truths and the power of the Gospel. And then that equipping is followed with opportunities to apply the Gospel throughout society and culture in experiences both here and abroad.

For example, this fall, three of our education licensure students were in Budapest, Romania, to fulfill their student teaching requirements for their bachelor’s degrees and teaching certifications. Four of our students participated in the Tennessee Intercollegiate Student Legislature event in Nashville. Not only did they win honors in the legislature, but they were awarded second place among the 70-plus colleges whose students argued their cases before the Tennessee Supreme Court.

This spring, eight students will travel to Cambodia to experience mission and justice ministries in a culture very different from what they have known. Our music students have garnered some of the music teacher’s association’s top awards in Tennessee for collegiate competition; our volleyball and cross country teams have won their conference championships; and our cross country team finished 13th in NAIA national competition in Vancouver, Wash. And this summer, our Acts Project students representing a wide variety of majors will again minister through internships around the globe.

Our mission, Educating students to become servants of Christ to make a difference in today’s world, begins with a consistent teaching of biblical truth coupled with multiple opportunities to apply that truth to all aspects of culture. Yes, we are strangers and pilgrims in this life in that we yearn to experience our Kingdom life to come; but we have today an earnest responsibility and privilege to apply God’s truth to all of life. Thank you for your continued prayer and support that enable us to carry out Bryan’s mission.

Here is a growing awareness among Americans that religious freedom in our country has come under sustained pressures. In the public square where freedom of religion meets public policy, it becomes clearer all the time that there is a high price to be paid for being true to one’s conscience.

Dr. Matthew J. Franck, director of the William E. and Carol G. Simon Center on Religion and the Constitution at the Witherspoon Institute, made that statement in a lecture at Hillsdale College this past fall. In his lecture, Dr. Franck cited examples from higher education, state and local governments, and the courts, where “we see the First Amendment turned on its head or simply disregarded, in active hostility to the place of religion in our public life.”

Statements by the president and secretary of state concerning “freedom of worship’ as though it marked the full extent of freedom of religion are other examples of the erosion of religious – specifically Christian – liberties in the public square. And of course there is the infamous Health and Human Services ‘contraception mandate,’ the cause of the most pointed confrontation in recent memory between a presidential administration and major figures in America’s religious communities.”

Dr. Franck’s lecture chronicles a litany of offenses against religious freedom by government authorities acting in a manner that those authorities, he hopes, believe to be in the common good.

But why has a Christian worldview become so unpopular or offensive when Christians attempt to live out what they believe?

Theologically, the issue may simply lie in the manner in which Christians conduct themselves. Bryan College’s Dr. Ken Turner, professor of Bible, said, “The New Testament Epistles were written to small groups of disciples of Jesus who found themselves in different levels of persecution and suffering, trying to figure out how to live in light of the Gospel. We do not have (in Scripture) a worked-out political or social philosophy. But there are principles, like submitting to authority and witness. We are about mercy and justice and love.”

I Peter, Dr. Turner said, is his book of choice to guide
Christians in a cultural conflict. “Peter says that this fallen world is not our ultimate residence, it’s a temporary existence. He encourages us to get along. He acknowledges we will be persecuted because of our faith, but don’t let that make us become negative, skeptical fundamentalists. We are in spiritual warfare; expect to be caught in the crossfire.”

“when we abandon the political process, education, and so on, secularism steps in to fill the void.”

Peter encourages believers to engage the culture, “not go off and hide in our Christian communes. We are to engage in politics and economics and public institutions, but that is not our ultimate identity.”

At the same time, John Stonestreet argues that Christians may be responsible for some of the problems we face. Mr. Stonestreet, speaker and fellow for the Chuck Colson Center for Christian Worldview, said, “Nature abhors a vacuum. As Christians have failed to properly express and build culture around their faith commitments, when we abandon the political process, education, and so on, secularism steps in to fill the void. Once entrenched, secularism does not easily give that space back.”

A second issue is that many Christians seem to lack an understanding of the current social and political reality. “Many Christians seem to have the illusion that we live in the America of 50 years ago, and are unaware how significant current challenges like the HHS (federal Department of Health and Human Services) mandate pose for people of faith,” he said. “It’s stunning to me that every Christian college, every Christian charity has not joined the lawsuit against the HHS mandate on health care. The law redefines what counts as a religious organization.”

While Christians’ actions may have contributed to negative opinions, the worldview of American society has something to do with it as well, Dr. Clark Rose, professor of psychology at Bryan, believes. “It starts with the idea of separation of church and state being used to strip anything Christian from most public and academic spheres,” he said. “That’s a total dismissal of what our Founding Fathers had in mind. This mistaken idea has grown in acceptance through court decisions and is advocated in the media.

“References to religion, a higher power, or morality are sort of making a comeback, but as Oprah Winfrey approaches things. In our culture, we don’t really have a need for God. We can be pretty well self-sufficient. People have shelter, food, four or five TVs in their home. There is no need to depend on God. It’s the whole humanistic, self-esteem, self-reliant, ‘me generation’ thing.”

But Prof. Kevin Clauson, director of the Bryan Center for Law and Public Policy, cautioned that some perceived hostility toward Christians may simply be that—perceived. “Sometimes when you get a decision from the Supreme Court or the president it looks like opposition is everywhere and it is continuous,” he said. “When the Supreme Court protects a minority, it ends up discriminating against Christianity. Every time they say you can’t have prayer at a public event they are protecting the minority, but what about the majority who want it?

“The Supreme Court is different now; it’s a little more friendly toward Christians. But the executive branch has no regard for traditional Christianity. I think a lot of liberals in politics perceive the Evangelical community as supporting the Republican party, so much (hostility) is a reaction against that,” he added.

Dr. Turner echoed the question of perception. “Looking historically, how much of history seems to repeat itself? Is the opposition we are experiencing now different than Christians in earlier times have experienced? Certainly we’re not being arrested for meeting publicly, but life is different than it was for us.”

Changing society’s attitudes about Christians begins with Christians, Dr. Turner said. “The New Testament injunction is that if you are persecuted, make sure it’s the offense of the cross, not you. We have been hypocrites. We want to speak prophetically into the culture, but we have winked at our own sin.”

“if you are persecuted, make sure it’s the offense of the cross, not you.”

Dr. Rose agreed. “There is a lot of undoing to be done. That’s the sad part of it. A lot of where we are today unfortunately we brought on ourselves. We need to offer basic biblical truths that can be applied to situations, to make people say, ‘Oh, that’s what Christianity is all about.’ An example of that could be found in Dave Ramsey’s financial freedom class, where people learn that if you apply biblical principles you can be free from financial bondage.”

Mr. Stonestreet would concur. “The vacuum that nature abhors has a lot to do with the lack of Christians providing for the cultural good. Chuck Colson called it the ‘political illusion,’ that the solutions we need are purely political. We have a call to build and preserve culture fully. Redemption has a lot of ‘re’ words in it: restore, reconcile, recapture.

“All of us have to do whatever good we can, and the good we can do is important. Christians who didn’t vote in this past election should be ashamed of themselves. Groups of Christians can come together and work creatively, collaboratively on the needs around them. How can we act redemptively? How can we address the problems next door?

Another thing is to learn whatever you can. An informed Christian citizen will come up with ideas.”

Dr. Clauson added that Evangelicals need to be sure their responses to political differences are Christ-like. “There are matters that are clear in Scripture,” he said, “but not every Evangelical believes that every (political question) should be handled by the federal government. Even in politics—perhaps especially in politics—Evangelicals should exhibit behavior that is a clear testimony to society that Jesus Christ is more than just a slogan, but a way of life.”

This tour will be a unique time to see the Smoky Mountains through the lens of Biblical creationism. The tour will be led by Todd Wood and Roger Sanders, both faculty of the Bryan College Center for Origins Research. Dr. Wood has spent 12 years researching creationist biology, and Dr. Sanders has a vast experience in botany and ecology research. These experts will help you to understand how the Great Smoky Mountains relate to the history of the world as recorded in the Bible. How were the mountains formed? How do they relate to the great Flood of Noah’s time? What about the plants and animals that call the park home? What do they tell us about God’s wise designs? This is your opportunity to find out first hand. You may think you know the Smokies, but you’ve never experienced them like this!

Note: The tour will not be strenuous and will not require extensive hiking.
Jensen Named Interim Alumni Director

Bob Jensen, ’80, has been named interim Alumni Director, succeeding David Tromanhauser, ’80, who resigned recently. Vice President for Advancement Blake Hudson, in announcing the appointment, said, “We are delighted that Bob has agreed to take on this added responsibility. Bob has a long, deep commitment to Bryan College, and his willingness to step up in this way will help strengthen alumni ties to the college.”

Mr. Jensen joined the college staff in July as associate director of career services following a career in law enforcement that included 20 years with the U.S. Secret Service. He is the son of the late Dr. Irving L. Jensen, long-time Bible professor at Bryan and author of numerous study guides and commentaries on the Bible.

“I’ve enjoyed working with students, connecting them with alumni and others as they transition to new job and internship opportunities,” Mr. Jensen said. “My goal during this interim period is to continue to strengthen the ties between students and alumni.”

“The mission of the college is to equip students to serve Christ to make a difference in the world. That’s a mission I believe in, and I think Bryan alumni believe that as well. I want to help maintain that focus while Bryan seeks a permanent replacement for David, a friend of mine who has left a significant imprint on the Bryan community. I just want to be where God wants me to be.”

Ed Department Receives Positive Review!

Bryan’s education department has received a positive review from a Tennessee Board of Examiners evaluation team and anticipates official approval when the review process is completed.

Academic Vice President Dr. Bradford Sample said the review team “plans to recommend all of Bryan’s education programs for approval to the Advisory Committee of the State Board of Examiners. The Advisory Committee will officially publish their results in July, but we are happy with the preliminary.”

Dr. Steve DeGeorge, head of the education program, said the report indicates the education department “is in compliance with state standards for teacher preparation, as well as with standards of the National Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education.”

Rhea Native Donates Thesis on Scopes Trial

Spring City, Tenn., native Kari Edwards presented a copy of her Master’s thesis on the Scopes Trial to the Bryan library this fall.

Ms. Edwards, who earned a Master of Arts degree in Southern Studies from the University of Mississippi, said the Bryan library staff and archivist Stephanie Wood were “very helpful” as she conducted research on the trial.

Her thesis “looks at the Scopes Trial as a significant religious event that altered the course of Christian fundamentalism and the creationist movement, and perpetuated some of the religious stereotypes about the South,” she said. “I was looking at William Jennings Bryan and the community of Dayton particularly.”

The title of her thesis is “Six Days of Twenty-Four Hours: The Scopes Trial, Antievolutionism, and the Last Crusade of William Jennings Bryan.”

MBA Wins National Notice

A recognition this fall has put Bryan’s MBA with a concentration in Human Resource Management in an elite circle of institutions offering similar programs.

Dr. Michael Chase, dean of adult and graduate studies, said the college has been notified that the Society for Human Resource Management (SHRM) “has acknowledged that its MBA with a concentration in Human Resource Management fully aligns with SHRM’s HR Curriculum Guidebook and Templates.”

SHRM is “recognized nationally as playing a vital role in setting quality standards in HR programs,” Dr. Chase said. “It is the professional organization in the world for HR practitioners.”

Throughout the world, 280 programs in 219 educational institutions have been acknowledged by SHRM as being in alignment with its Curriculum Guidebook and Templates. “The HR Curriculum Guidebook and Templates were developed by SHRM to define the minimum human resources content areas that should be studied by HR students at the undergraduate and graduate levels,” Dr. Chase said.

For Bryan to earn this recognition, Dr. Chase said “all of the curriculum for the MBA with the HRM concentration was submitted to SHRM for review. After a careful analysis it was determined that the program did meet the established content guidelines.”

In addition to the HR concentration, Bryan also offers an MBA with a concentration in Marketing.

Students Provide Fruit Snacks at Rhea YMCA

Bryan students who tutor children at the Rhea Family YMCA have turned the “apple for the teacher” idea on its head.

Following a campus fund drive, and with matching funds from United Way of Rhea County, Bryan students are providing fruit snacks one day a week for children they tutor at the Y. Olivia Eanes and Anissa Meberg, who head the college’s Practical Christian Involvement tutoring ministry, said the idea came from an encouragement to seek closer ties with community organizations they serve. For Olivia and Anissa, that meant the YMCA.

YMCA Program Director Lamont Singleton told Olivia and Anissa that “a lot of kids don’t have the opportunity to get fresh fruit in the afternoon. The state has recommended we provide a healthy snack, but right now all we’re able to do is provide Little Debbies. I think this will be good for our kids.”

The Bryan students approached A.J. Caudill, food service director, about buying fruit through Pioneer College Caterers, and he readily agreed, Anissa said. “A.J. said it would cost about $900 to provide fruit for the whole year” for the 50 to 60 children in the tutoring program.

To raise the money, students enlisted Drs. Brian Eisenback, Salvatore Musumeci, Ken Turner and Mr. Michael Palmer to be the targets for the drive. The “winner,” Dr. Eisenback, agreed to wear a banana suit costume one day, Olivia said.

Will Jones Heads to State Legislature

Will Jones, a senior English and Politics and Government double major, has been selected to participate in the Tennessee Legislative Internship Program for the General Assembly’s 2013 session.

Will, from Dayton, Tenn., will work in Nashville from Jan. 7 through May 31, unless the assembly adjourns earlier. “I’ll be doing everything from picking up coffee to making copies, to researching legislation, to briefing legislators on the day’s business,” he said. “A lot depends on where I end up, whether I’m assigned to
The internship program is open to students from Tennessee colleges. Interns will work in legislative offices and committees during the week, and will have weekly meetings with state leaders.

Bryan President Dr. Stephen Livesay congratulated Will on his selection. “This is a significant accomplishment for Will to be chosen for this highly selective legislative internship. Will is an outstanding student who has distinguished himself academically and as a leader on campus. I believe he will do an outstanding job and, I trust, pave the way for more Bryan students to explore this avenue of public service.”

Bryan College joined forces with the American Chestnut Foundation (ACF) Nov. 14, when two American chestnut trees were planted as part of an effort to restore the tree to its native habitat.

Tom Saielli, ACF southern regional science coordinator, said the trees “symbolize 30 years of work, breeding and cross-breeding” American and Chinese chestnuts in an effort to develop a true American chestnut that has the blight-resistance of its Chinese counterpart.

As he prepared the first tree for planting, Mr. Saielli recounted the history of the American chestnut. “Until about 100 years ago, it was the dominant tree in the hardwood forest in the east. Its wood was used in construction, making musical instruments, railroad ties. It was a major source of tannin. About 100 years ago, a fungal pathogen was introduced accidentally from China,” he said. “It took about 50 years to wipe out the American chestnut.”

In the coming years, Dr. Roger Sanders, director of the Bryan Arboretum, will monitor and conduct research on the trees to help ACF with its assessment of blight resistance.

Bryan President Dr. Stephen Livesay promised that “We will be good stewards of these trees.” He acknowledged that a tree that produces nuts would fit in nicely on a campus that already “has a lot of nuts.”
“For good or for bad, everyone influences.

As a student I was headed in the wrong direction and Summit helped me become a bold influence for truth on my campus. The rising generation desperately needs that kind of leadership. Come study with me at Summit this summer and begin your leadership journey.”

William Jennings Bryan was no stranger to controversy. As a progressive Democrat, he advocated for laws and policies he believed would benefit the ordinary citizen and limit the power of the moneyed class. Along the way, he was derisively described as a radical, a socialist (or worse), or even insane. But it is probable that no decision he made brought more personal condemnation or caused him more personal anguish than his resignation as President Woodrow Wilson’s secretary of state.

Bryan and Wilson were not personal friends before Wilson’s run for the Democratic Party’s presidential nomination in 1912. But Wilson’s appreciation for Bryan and Bryan’s intervention on Wilson’s behalf in the party convention in Baltimore helped secure Wilson’s nomination and eventual election. As a result, Wilson named Bryan his secretary of state.

His tenure was highlighted by negotiating treaties with some 30 countries providing for investigation and arbitration of differences before the countries would resort to war. He also worked tirelessly with Congress to promote Wilson’s domestic agenda. His wife, Mary, recalled in The Memoirs of William Jennings Bryan that “the parting of the ways has come from a radical difference in foreign policy. In domestic policies the two have worked most harmoniously” (Bryan, 420).

With the outbreak of World War I in Europe in 1914, Wilson announced a policy of strict neutrality for the United States, although commercial activity seemed to be weighted toward the Allied powers, particularly Great Britain. On March 28, 1915, a German U-boat sank the British passenger/cargo ship Falaba. This incident sparked the series of events culminating in Bryan’s resignation as secretary of state.

Among those killed in the sinking was Leon Thrasher, an American engineer. “While American public opinion exploded with indignation at the death of Thrasher, Bryan sought information about the sinking of the Falaba from both British and German sources” (Coletta, 301). Wilson to this point—and until the Lusitania was sunk five weeks later—was undecided about American policy on submarine warfare. He turned to Bryan and Robert Lansing, counselor to the Department of State, for recommendations.

Lansing argued that if Americans were aboard Allies’ ships their presence as neutrals should shield the vessels from attack. Bryan, on the other hand, argued that “the doctrine of contributory negligence has some bearing on this case.” He told the president on April 7 that he believed the people did not want war, and objected to the idea that one man “acting for himself and his own interests, and without consulting his government [could] involve the entire nation in difficulty when he had ample warning of the risks which he assumed” (Coletta, 302, 305).

He further argued in a letter to Wilson on April 23 that opposing submarine warfare against merchant shipping would cost the United States its mantle of neutrality, opening the door to be drawn into war. “If we admit the right of the submarine to attack merchantmen but condemn their particular act or class of acts as inhuman, we will be embarrassed by the fact that we have not protested against Great Britain’s defense of the right to prevent foods reaching non-combatant enemies. I fear that denunciation of one and silence as to the other will be construed by some as partiality” (Williams, 379).

When the Lusitania, another British passenger/cargo ship, was sunk May 7, 1915, the stage for Bryan’s resignation was set. With 123 American lives lost, the public was eager for revenge. Bryan signed an initial note to the German government protesting the sinking, but the German response urged a condemnation of Great Britain as well. Bryan rejected that overture, replying “that the United States would consider no suggestions from Germany made prior to her reply to the Lusitania note” (Coletta, 322).

Wilson’s cabinet debated the tone of a second note to Germany, a majority favoring a stern stance. “Will said the note should be so modified as to give Germany a chance to express a willingness for mediation, or for investigation of facts, rather.

That as phrased, and particularly with no protest sent to England, the note left Germany no chance to do anything but refuse to discontinue her submarine warfare” (Bryan, 421).

At that cabinet meeting on June 1, the president asked Bryan to suggest alternative actions, but Bryan responded that his position made it unfair to the president to remain in the cabinet and that he planned to resign. “Wilson replied, ‘My dear Mr. Bryan—you must not do that! Stay and help keep us out of war!” (Kazin, 238).

Wilson subsequently rejected Bryan’s recommendation to offer arbitration, to request Congress to prohibit passenger ships from carrying arms, and to write a note protesting British interference with American trade with neutrals. “Since he could not compel Wilson to adopt his views and was too determined to give in to Wilson’s, Bryan’s only alternative was to resign. That he did not do so until June 8 may have resulted from Solicitor Cone Johnson’s telling him that his position was ‘perfectly consistent’ but that he ‘ought to stay on at least until the correspondence with Germany was completed’” (Coletta 335).

Bryan met with Wilson on June 7 and confirmed his intention to resign. He was invited to attend a cabinet meeting on June 9, after which he had lunch with several of his colleagues. At the luncheon he told them, “I have had to take the course I have chosen. The President has one view; I have had a different one. I cannot go along with him in this note. I think it makes for war. I believe that I can do more on the outside to prevent war than I can on the inside. I can work to control popular opinion so that it will not exert pressure for extreme action which the president does not want. We both want the same thing, peace” (Coletta, 343-343).

In pondering his decision, Bryan understood the consequences. “He told me what it would mean, how he would be abused, vilified, and misrepresented,” Mary Bryan wrote (Bryan, 423). His analysis was correct.

“Bryan was as thoroughly flayed as any man in American history by a multitude of expert castigators. ‘Mountebank,’ ‘faker,’ ‘political wirepuller,’ ‘Billy Sunday humbugger,’ ‘grape-juice clown,’ and ‘ward politician’ were but a few of the personal epithets hurled at him” (Coletta, 347).

Historian Michael Kazin says, “Since the sinking of the Lusitania, most big-city papers, whether Democratic or Republican, had been demanding a forceful response just short of war. Now their least favorite cabinet member wanted to divide a nation still in mourning—and to let a nation of undersea criminals off the hook. ‘Unspeakable treachery,’ roared the World. Henry Watterson contended that ‘men have been shot and beheaded, even hanged, drawn and quartered, for treason less heinous.’ Walter Hines Page cursed ‘the yellow streak of a sheer fool’ who longed to return to ‘the applauding multitude’” (Kazin, 239).

Robert Cherney points out that while the national press excoriated Bryan, his “mail, however, brought a deluge of letters supporting his action” (Cherney, 152).

As time passed, opinions about his resignation began to change. Josephus Daniels, secretary of the Navy, wrote to Kansas newspaper editor William Allen White years later, “The longer I live the more I think Bryan had a vision greater than that with which he was credited. He said from the first that if we insisted upon our right to send our ships into the war zone it would bring us into the war. Wilson didn’t think so and I doubted whether Bryan was right, but events showed that he saw farther than most of us” (Coletta, 360).

William G. McAdoo, Wilson’s son-in-law and secretary of the treasury, came to a similar conclusion. In his speech at a memorial service for Bryan in Hollywood, California, in 1925, he said, “I differed with Mr. Bryan’s position at that time, but I recognized the loftiness of his purposes. The President and Mr. Bryan were animated by precisely the same motive—to protect American rights and to avoid by every honorable means armed conflict with any of the belligerent powers during the European war; their differences were merely of opinion as to the best method of accomplishing this end. Mr. Bryan was thoroughly misunderstood by a great number of his fellow-countrymen. This is due largely to the partisan character of his critics and to the persistent misrepresentations to which he, like every great figure in public life, has been subject.”

Bryan’s reputation certainly was bruised by the criticism heaped upon him, but it seems his followers largely stood by him. Not until his involvement with the Scopes Trial in 1925 did he face a similar barrage of vituperation. Yet in 1925 he faced the challenge before him with the same composure that, despite his critics, he would do what he believed right – in the eyes of his Lord and for the good of his country.

Hundreds of alumni gathered the first weekend of October to celebrate Homecoming 2012 with a look back and a look ahead.

“We had a wonderful weekend as alumni reconnected, got to interact with some of our outstanding students, and had a great time in the Word,” Alumni Director David Tromanhauser said. “It was well-attended and we had wonderful comments from those who were here.”

Members of the Class of 1987 were special guests for a 25th reunion dinner on Friday before a dessert and coffee social brought everyone together in the dining room that night.

The second annual Breakfast on the Bluff at Fort Bluff Camp on Saturday brought about 70 early-risers for pancakes and fruit in the Bluff House overlooking Dayton and the Tennessee River. A cold rain encouraged everyone to stay inside and take a close look at the facilities the camp has to offer.

The rain stopped in time for the tailgate lunch before the Lions took on (and beat 2-0) St. Catharine College in the homecoming soccer match. At intermission, seniors Amy Morris of Jacksboro, Tenn., and Kelly Findley of Tallahassee, Fla., were named queen and king.

Mary Frances Rudd Carlson, daughter of Bryan’s third president, Dr. Judson Rudd, told alumni during the awards dinner that Saturday was the 42nd anniversary of her father’s homegoing. “In cleaning out his office I found a carbon copy of a letter thanking a lady for a contribution of $1.

“I hope all alumni have Bryan on your priority list,” she said. “There are few places you can give where your gift goes around the world in the person of alumni who share Christ Above All.”

President Stephen Livesay gave a “state of the college” report, pointing out recent growth in enrollment and physical improvements. But, he said, “There can be nothing greater for us than to uphold our motto, Christ Above All.” (See related stories for news about award recipients.)

Homecoming concluded Sunday with a chapel service led by Schaun Myers, ’87. Scott Hooker, ’82, and Jim Koan, ’87, led worship.
Bryan Athletics Director and former men’s soccer coach Dr. Sandy Zensen and Isidro Loaiza, one of his former players, were inducted into the Bryan Athletics Hall of Fame.

Dr. Zensen announced the honor for Isidro before he was surprised by Alumni Director David Tromanhauser with his own recognition.

Isidro played for the Lions from 1997 to 2000 on three conference championship teams. He was twice named a National Christian Colleges Athletics Association All American, three time to the Tennessee Valley Athletics Conference (predecessor to the Appalachian Athletics Conference) All Conference team, and three times to the TVAC All Conference Academic team.

“Mediocrity was never his friend,” Zensen said. “Excellence was characteristic of his life on and off the field.”

Dr. Zensen coached the soccer team for 22 seasons, compiling a record of 267-134-27, placing him in the top 25 of NAIA men’s soccer coaches. He was named AAC Coach of the Year five times, NCCAA Mid-East Regional Coach of the Year six times, NCCAA National Coach of the Year in 1995, and National Soccer Coaches Association of America/NCCAA National Coach of the Year in 2003. His teams reached postseason play 20 of his 22 years.

On his retirement after the 2011 season, AAC coaches created the Dr. Sandy Zensen Champion of Character Award, to be presented to the male conference soccer player who best represents the core values of the NAIA Champions of Character program: integrity, respect, responsibility, sportsmanship and servant leadership.

Dayton Mayor Bob Vincent was named an honorary alumnus of the college during the Homecoming awards dinner.

Mayor Vincent, who has served on the Dayton City Council for more than 31 years, is Dayton’s first popularly elected mayor.

Alumni Director David Tromanhauser said, “Bob has been a friend of the college for many years. He has served on the President’s Roundtable and has been very active in supporting the Bryan Opportunity Program.”

Mr. Vincent is a retired vice president of Suburban Manufacturing Co. in Dayton. During his career he was active in the national Recreational Vehicle Industry Association and the Recreational Vehicle Manufacturers Association. He was inducted into the RVAM Hall of Fame in 1997, and was recognized by National RV Business Magazine as one of the 25 most influential executives in the RV industry in the past 25 years.

In 1975, when Bryan Life made its debut, there was no Internet, no email, and smart phones were ideas in science fiction stories.

Today, many of our readers prefer to get their information online, and the cost of printing and postage has skyrocketed. To help us be good stewards of our resources, we are encouraging our readers to let us know how you prefer to read Bryan Life.

Beginning with the Spring 2013 edition, we will mail Bryan Life to alumni and financial supporters of the college who request print copies. An online version will be available on the Bryan College website to anyone else who is interested.

In the coming weeks, visit the Bryan Life page on the Bryan website, www.bryan.edu/bryan_life, to see how the digital version will look.
